Paper-III Option (iv) Introducing Development Studies

This paper aims at introducing the inter-disciplinary field of development studies. The student will be required to write a term paper which will link the four aspects outlined below- the theories, documents, the actors, and the specific issue they take up. They will be encouraged to take up case studies of specific organizations or institutions while researching on an issue.

1. Theories and Approaches

   Neo-classical Economics, Neo-liberalism, Modernisation, Human Development, Approaches in ecology, gender and culture, post-development

2. Reading policies, documents and reports

   New International Economic Order, Brundtland Commission Report, Dag Hammarskjold Foundation report, Human Development Reports, World Bank World Development Reports, Millennium Development Goals, Rio Declaration of Environment and Development, Assessment Reports on climate change by Inter-Governmental Panels on Climate Change (IPCC).

3. Key actors involved in development practice – nation states, international agencies and institutions like UN, WTO, World Bank, IMF, Non-governmental organizations and think tanks (both national and international like Greenpeace, WWF, or Centre for Science and Environment India), social movements.

4. Key issues in Development studies- Climate Change, Poverty, Population, Displacement, Agriculture, Outsourcing.

P-III Option (ix) Exploring the Politics of India's Globalisation

Course Objective

This course examines the perspectives, policies and political strategies of some of the principal 'domestic' actors involved in the globalisation of India. The course is premised on two postulates. First, contemporary Indian politics cannot be studied without an understanding of the globalisation processes as they have unfolded in the country over the last two decades. Second, Indian actors have been far from passive recipients or helpless victims of these processes. Rather, they have acted as strategic actors trying the maximise gains from the opportunities offered, and minimise the risks from the challenges posed by globalisation.

Course Content

1. Globalisation and political parties in India

- 'National' political parties: leftist, centrist and right-wing. Possible candidates are the Communist parties, Congress, the BJP. During the last fifteen years, all of them have been in opposition and also, directly or in directly, in power. These parties have easily identifiable 'theoreticians' in their ranks who have written on the subject. These parties have touched on the theme of globalisation in their election manifestos, and have engaged in parliamentary debates wherein they have initiated, supported or opposed bills which had bearing on the question of globalisation.
- Regional political parties such as the Telagu Desam, Akali Dal, National Conference, ADMK/AIADMK, Trinammol Congress, Shiv sena, etc. have either ruled in provinces or held balance in the coalitional politics at the Centre. Their stances on globalisation are of great significance because they strive to influence Central policies, as also bypass these as and when possible and desirable in order to establish direct linkages with globalisation processes.

2. Globalisation and Indian economy

- Industry and business groupings: various chambers of industry and commerce such as the CII and FICCI, as also informal groupings such as the 'Bombay Club', have articulated their perceptions and positions on various aspects of globalisation, and sought in their interaction with political parties a consensus that survives changes in government.

- Trade unions such as the INTUC, BMS, AITUC, CITU have expressed their perceptions of globalisation in their articulation of the interests of the working class and and state sector employees.

- Agricultural interest groupings: such as the Bhartiya Kissan Union and the Shetkari Sangathan, have been most articulate about pricing, exports and imports of agricultural commodities, agricultural subsidies, patenting of seeds and agricultural technologies, etc.

3. Globalisation and politics of Identity
   Various identity based movements and organisations have viewed globalisation either as a threat to local cultures, life styles, values and beliefs, or have welcomed it because it cannot but weaken the centralizing, hegemonizing and homogenizing tendencies of the state.

4. Globalisation and Civil Society movements
   NGOs and voluntary groupings working in the field of environment, health and women have expressed views on whether globalisation means greater or lesser degradation, deprivation and exploitation.
